While culture as a whole may lose out, the oft-ignored film short has a lot to gain from the decline of the American attention span. Focused on approachability and fun, the Chicago Short Film Brigade is a band of artists and film aficionados devoted to pulling the pretensions out of the genre. (By the by, the cross-disciplinary group's VP just happens to be hometown hero and musician Andrew Bird). Each year the group selects a slate of worthy shorts for evening screenings — eventually offering a grand prize during its best-of show at the Film Center.
